Workshop Preamble

Integrity and accountability are the foundation for trust and legitimacy of the institutions, processes, organisations and professions on whom individuals, communities and our democracies depend. And yet internationally, we face a crisis of trust that is eroding public confidence in some of our most important institutions -from politics and the media, to the care, educational and financial sectors, churches, community organisations and sporting clubs, among numerous others.

Numerous reports and a growing literature on how to address the crisis of trust highlight the importance of culture, responsibility and leadership in (re)building and sustaining public trust.

This workshop focuses on these, and on the imperative and the skills to 'think institutionally'. Using case-based exercises and a practical problem-solving approach, we explore how leaders can foster habits and practices that form and maintain the character and cultures that underpin high-trust institutions, on which the public and their members can safely rely.
